Fatigue Risk Management

Updated: 2019

- Fatigue risk affects us all. It can compromise patient safety, personal safety, and well-being
- Everyone in medical education has a shared responsibility for fatigue risk management (FRM)
- Physical indicators include yawning, eye-rubbing, drooping eyelids, and reduced motor skills
- Institution roles: Just culture with FRM as a priority; trainees can contribute to management plan
- Trainee roles: Fatigue self-assessment & management; declaring fatigue risks and incidents to team

Act

- Seek help when needed. See compiled "Wellness Resources" document. Other sources include PARA taxi program, your team, your peers, the chiefs, and Dr. Marcy Mintz (Program Director)
- Institution strategies: educational resources and workshops on FRM, FRM policies, clear and explicit handover protocols, fatigue risk assessment (and documentation in a fatigue risk register)
- Personal strategies: sleep hygiene, exercise, work in teams, judicious caffeine (Ch 8 of FRM toolkit)

Adapt

- Creating a just culture where FRM is actively discussed as the norm. Having meaningful, actionable steps to improve the safety of trainees and the clinical learning environment
- Auditing the FRM strategy and aiming for continuous quality improvement to local FRM practices
- Engaging in conferences, workshops, and presentations on FRM (page 55 of FRM toolkit)
- Developing resources and collaborating in research projects on FRM (pages 56-57 of FRM toolkit)
